

nearly had their legs torn off. Benjermin Golderman, Leonard Wiseman, Peter Granata, and Peter Fosco had burns and lacerations.

D'Andrea once again lost the election to Powers, but it didn't matter. D'Andrea was shot five times as he entered his house. He died of his wounds shortly after. His funeral was held at Our Lady of Pompeii church in little Italy with 6,000 on lookers in attendance. D'Andrea was to be laid to rest at Mount Olivet cemetery, but because he had not lived his life as a Catholic, he could not be buried in a Catholic cemetery. The only cemetery that would take him was Mount Greenwood. Among the pallbearers, carrying D'Andrea's three-thousand-dollar-bronze casket was Joseph "Diamond Joe" Esposito, Peter Fosco, Dr. Gaetano Ronga, Dr. Eugene Chesrow, Constantino Vitello, and state representative Charles Cola.

Fosco's power grew in politics through the 1920s and 1930s. He was aligned with labor heavyweight Mike "Dago Mike" Carrozzo, president of the Street Labors Union, and number one labor cronies for Johnny Torrio, Al Capone, Vito Miraballi and Ciro Balzano. Another close friend Fosco aligned himself with was labor racketeer Sam Nanini. Nanini controlled and owned Rock Road Construction Company. Rock Road Construction was handed many of the construction contracts throughout Chicago from the crocket hands of Mike Carrozzo. Both Carrozzo and Fosco received a cut of the prophet from all the projects.

Among some of the enterprises, Peter Fosco was involved in dates back to the 1920's when he was involvement in the booze wars during prohibition. Fosco established himself in a whiskey operation for the Capone syndicate, which netted him over 100 thousand dollars. Not only was he a partner in a distilling operation, but he also used his connections to have whiskey imported to Chicago from other countries.

Some reports state that when "Diamond Joe" Esposito was killed in 1928, Peter Fosco took over were Esposito left off in the Hod Carriers Union.

In 1936, Fosco was named Regional manager of the Chicago Regional Office of the Laborers International Union. Now
